

For questions 1 to 5

Chemical munitions have been found at a seaport in Japan, which were dumped by the then Japanese Military around the end of the Second World War. The Government of Japan has been investigating these munitions, removing them and making them harmless as they are discovered, with the cooperation from a private company which owns enough expertise.

For questions 6 to 9

The Government of Japan currently does not have a formal scheme or activity as described in these questions.
